"Think it over." "It sounds reasonable."

Henry Horton will be seen in the great play of season life "Snug Harbor" at the opera house on next Friday evening. It is one of the best American plays ever written, dealing with a new and original theme, portraying a type of truly American character, the fisherman of Gloucester. It is the most elaborately staged comedy drama on the road to-day carrying as it does every piece of scenery and every bit of property used in the production. The scenery of special interest, owing to the fact that it was painted from photos taken where the scenes of the play are laid and in one act a scene at sea is shown off Eastern Point, Gloucester, Mass., with a full-blown ship battling in the night's waves. With that clever character actor, Henry Horton, and a notable cast, including Miss Louise Frankelburgh, it is the maximum verve of the press and public everywhere, that this is one of the best attractions on the road to-day.

PAINT MIXING AND GRINDING

The more thoroughly paint is mixed and the finer it is ground, the more economical it is for the consumer.

Hand-mixed lead and oil and the ordinary prepared paint, with which the market today is flooded, receive the crudest mixing and grinding. Microscopic tests in B. P. S. "Sealed Evidence" show the great difference between the mixing and grinding of hand-mixed Paint. The former is coarse and gritty—the latter fine and even.

The hand-mixed and so-called "cheap" Paint, when spread upon a building, produces an uneven coating, thin in some places and thick in others, containing many unground lead crystals. The action of rain, sleet and snow soon wears the oil, or binder, from the top of these lead crystals, permitting the lead to fall out, thus leaving fine openings through which the moisture passes under the paint, soon destroying it. These little openings also catch and hold the soot and dust washing down the side of the house, quickly making the paint look dingy and dirty.

B. P. S. Paint, on account of its pure materials, perfect formula and absolute accuracy and thoroughness of mixing and grinding, in specially constructed machinery, when applied on a building is a perfectly smooth, even coating, glossy, yet tough and elastic, upon which the weather and dirt have little effect.

Owing to the impure materials frequently used, and to the lack of thorough mixing and grinding, hand-mixed and other prepared paint, figured by covering and spreading capacity and durability, is much more expensive to the consumer than B. P. S. Paint.
